City gets behind the wheel on self-driving cars

Study will look at how other cities are preparing for the technology

Stephanie Taylor Metro | Winnipeg

Self-driving cars may soon cruise through Winnipeg — and the city is already bracing for it.

Coun. Matt Allard (St. Boniface) asked Tuesday's committee on planning, property and development to task city staff with exploring how Winnipeg should prepare for driverless cars.

City staff will now take six months to study how other cities, in Canada and beyond, are also prepping for this new market.

"I don't want Winnipeg to be behind the eight-ball when other municipalities are looking at it," Allard told Tuesday's committee.

He added that although ours lags behind the populations of Toronto, Vancouver and Calgary, Winnipeg should be ready for when this "hugely disruptive technology" arrives.

Driverless cars will affect an array of policies and service areas from transit and land-use planning to traffic enforcement and parking. Allard said.

"There is a generational shift going on about how we think about transportation," John Kiernan, the city's planning director, said Tuesday.

"It will shape our city and how we build our cities."

Keeping in step with the changes to how people move around cities means getting ahead of the technological curve, he added.

"It will only speed up these changes over the next three to five years," Kiernan said.

City staff will now perform a crossjurisdictional review of what other cities have learned about driverless cars and how ours can build on their research.

Kieman added staff will also consult with the public works department and the province about the potential impact on the Highway Traffic Act.

Francophone leader a student of Riel

Justin Johnson is now president of the French-Canadian Youth Federation. He's approaching the job in the spirit of his hero. A Métis, he plans to champion indigenous and youth rights.

Braeden Jones Metro Winnipeg

The interests of francophone youth from coast-to-coast are now in the hands of a local student of "Riel-ism."

Justin Johnson, 24, became the 11th Manitoban elected president of the French-Canadian Youth Federation (FJCF) this past weekend in Ottawa.

Although he isn't the first Manitoban to hold the position — tasked with ensuring the "vitality of Canada's Francophonie" — he's very likely the most well-read on the history of the subject.

That's because Johnson — a Red River Métis himself, and great-great grandson of André Beauchemin, a member of Louis Riel's inner-circle — is developing the founder of Manitoba's political philosophy holistically, "taking into account his complete writings," which he says has never been done.

"I am trying to understand Riel the way Riel understood himself," Johnson said, joking that the punny handle of Rielism would be fitting for the ideology, given that Riel spoke often of "practical solutions."

He'll balance a pursuit of practical solutions in his new FJCF duties with completing his Master's thesis on Métis political philosophy for the University of Winnipeg's Indigenous Governance program.

He admits it's a challenging undertaking, but ever the Riel scholar, notes he's the same age Riel was when he participated in the Métis resistance against the annexation of Rupert's Land.

"He could have been a member of the FJCF if it had existed at the time," Johnson said.

Riel probably would have been the president of the

But Johnson, having read everything Riel wrote in French and English, plans to apply the principles of Métis governance in his new role just as Riel might have.

"I'd like to see how we can bring forth his (ideology) to the national level," he said.

To start, he plans on encouraging the FJCF membership to "take an active role on the issue of reconciliation."

"Obviously, most Canadians know vaguely what the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada (TRC) was about, but we can't necessarily say many Canadians in general are aware of the recommendations in the report," Johnson said. "I think French-speaking youth being willing to see how we can best respond to those recommendations — and understand reconciliation with First Nations Peoples — is the first step."

At the Ottawa AGM, Johnson said that point was one he found the membership (made up of 14-to-25 year-old francophone youth from nine provinces and two territories) received well.

"The TRC work brought this principal of reconciliation to the forefront in Canada, and it's a principal we can all apply in our relations with others," he said.

Another advocacy item the group has made some progress on and Johnson will continue to champion is the movement to lower the voting age to 16.

Provincial party leaders in New Brunswick, Prince-Edward Island and Ontario have responded positively to #vote16 advocacy from the FJCF and its partners, and a Private Member's Bill in the House of Commons to lower the voting age was introduced in January 2016.

With a series of consultations beginning on federal electoral reform, Johnson said the timing is right to discuss lowering the voting age. It's something his members are keen to fight for.

Johnson will also be at the heart of organizing the Canadian Francophone Games, being hosted in Moncton-Dieppe in 2017, which is designed to showcase cultural pride and involves on average more then 20,000 people between athletes, volunteers and spectators.

Manitoba voters didn't trust candidates, survey discovers

PROVINCIAL ELECTION

Non-voters told researchers they felt vote wouldn't count

Braeden Jones Metro Winnipeg

Manitobans who didn't vote in the last provincial election either didn't have time, were out of town or just flat-out didn't trust their candidates.

Those were among the top reasons registered voters didn't cast their ballots on April 19, according to a new Elections Manitoba report.

Following the 57 per cent voter turnout, Prairie Research Associates surveyed 400 nonvoters and 400 voters, revealing most who did not cast a ballot were either unable or untrusting.

Of the non-voters surveyed, 33 per cent said their reason for not voting involved a time conflict (18 per cent) or being out of town (15 per cent).

A further 20 per cent said they either didn't trust their candidates, didn't like their options, or were just plain disillusioned.

That reason for abstention is one University of Winnipeg politics professor Allen Mills predicted after the writ dropped,

Former Manitoba NDP Premier Greg Selinger and his wife Claudette leave a polling station after voting in the provincial election in Winnipeg, Tuesday. JOHN WOODS/THE CANADIAN PRESS as he asserted the "political elite (were) as incompetent as they have ever been."

"Altogether I think we are in a deep trough in terms of provincial politics in Manitoba," Mills told Metro at the time. "We really don't have a political class as competent and mature as previous political classes have been."

According to the new report, five per cent of voters didn't know who in that class deserved their vote. Ten per cent of nonvoters admitted they were not well informed or didn't have enough information on each party to make the decision.

Other reasons for not voting included being sick (six per cent), religious objections (three per cent) and a sense that their vote wouldn't matter (two per cent).

On that last point, responding to a different survey question, about half of the nonvoters (49 per cent) reported proportional representation "would make them more likely to vote," and one-in-seven said it would be "much more likely" they would vote following that kind of electoral reform.

However, the ability to vote online on the Elections Manitoba website would apparently be even more persuasive than eliminating the first-past-thepost system, as 59 per cent of non-voters said that option would make them more likely to vote.

People who did vote in 2016 were divided on whether they would vote online given the option.

Like non-voters, 59 per cent said they would be likely to vote online, but 37 per cent were opposed to the idea—contrasting BY THE NUMBERS

According to the Prairie Research Associates survey:

58 per cent of nonvoters surveyed said the current method of deciding who wins discourages them from voting

32 per cent of nonvoters and 34 per cent of voters felt the integrity of the vote could be compromised with online voting

90 per cent of voters and 70 per cent of nonvoters believe that it is important to vote with 27 per cent of non-voters who were indifferent and just 12 per cent who said it would make them less likely to vote.

"The most common concern among both voters and non-voters was that there is a greater chance for voter fraud when online voting is an option," the report said.

Spokesperson Alison Mitchell said online voting is part of the "broader context" Elections Manitoba considers when looking at voter participation, but "it's not something that's being looked at currently" in any serious way.

Gord Downie touring solo to promo album, film and comic Tragically Hip frontman Gord Downie has announced two solo shows for October, set to take place roughly two months after the iconic band wrapped its "Man Machine Poem" tour with a live broadcast concert that drew millions of viewers.

The project is inspired by the story of 12-year-old Chanie Wenjack, who died in 1966 after running away from the Cecilia Jeffrey Indian Residential School near Kenora, Ont.

The record was announced just weeks after a massive concert in Kingston, Ont., that marked the end of a tour many feared could be a final goodbye to Downie, who revealed in late May that he is terminally ill.

During that show, Downie called out to Prime Minister Justin Trudeau, who attended the concert, to help fix problems in Northern Canada.

Proceeds from the Secret Path album and graphic novel will go to the National Centre for Truth and Reconciliation at the University of Manitoba, which is dedicated to preserving the history of the residential school system.

There's still no word on whether Downie will bring his one-man show to Manitoba.

A spokesperson from Live Nation did not respond to a request for comment by deadline.

Tickets for the two shows are set to go on sale Friday.

Growth fees report may change: city staff

Stephanie Taylor Metro Winnipeg

Changes could be in the stars for Winnipeg's proposed growth fees plan, according to the city's planning director.

But when questioned by re-porters on Tuesday, John Kiernan deferred the matter to members of Mayor Brian Bowman's executive policy committee. Bowman's inner circle is expected to make a decision on Wednesday.

Kiernan reiterated the plans announced by Bowman and Coun. John Orlikow (River Heights-Fort Garry), chairman of the planning, property and development committee, last

The pair said Wednesday's committee would be asked to delay a vote on a new impact fee report in order to hold more industry and stakeholder consultations.

The report, submitted Sept. 1, nearly mirrors the recommendations made by Hemson Consulting Ltd., which said the city should implement growth fees on all new residential and non-residential homes.

The city's report features a start date of Jan. 1, 2017.

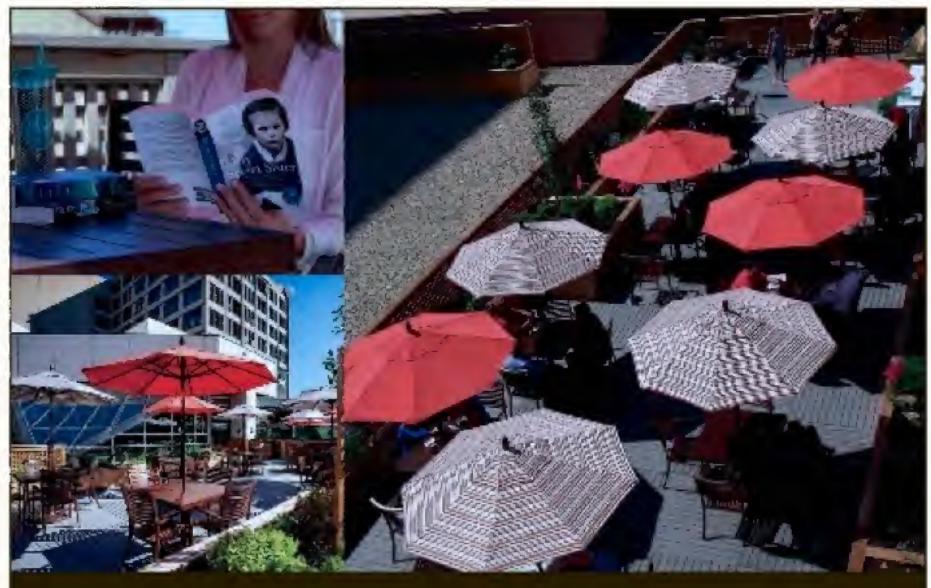

Kiernan said both the city's report and the Hemson study took a "broad brush approach," to the issue of growth fees.

"We think there's still the opportunity for having a more nuanced approach and alignment," Kiernan said.

He believes the city could impose a growth fee structure that falls in line with the planning policies around downtown densification outlined in OurWinnipeg, the city's official development plan.

"We want to be really clear. This is a giant step forward," Kiernan said.

"Is the tool perfect at the moment? No, it's not. But it's moved us down this road of discussion."

Consultations set to begin over the next 6 to 8 weeks

Stephanie Taylor Metro | Winnipeg

Winnipeggers will soon have their say on the future of the Public Safety Building site.

John Kiernan, the city's director of planning, property and development, said public consultations on the 2.4 acres of land will start in the next six to eight weeks. Department staff will collaborate with CentreVenture, the city's arms-length downtown development agency, and Red River College, located next door to the former police headquarters, on the community consultation process.

"We think there's a number of opportunities to generate ideas about the site," he said Tuesday.

Tuesday.

"We don't want to go with a preformed idea. There may be multiple partners that we cobble together to be able to do something at that location."

Kiernan said there's also been discussions with university students to assist with design planning sessions.

He said city officials will meet with CentreVenture in 10 days to discuss consultation plans.

Back in March, council voted to task staff and Centre-Venture with devising a plan that would see the PSB and shuttered Civic Centre Parkade torn down in order make way for a large public space and future private development.

He added the plan would have to be approved, which is required in order for council to order a building be demolished.

In the meantime, Friday's committee on innovation will be asked to approve a business plan for the Winnipeg Parking Authority that includes spending $1.8 million to tear down the parkade in 2017.

Gravel truck and train collide at crossing

A train has derailed near Hadashville, Man., after colliding with a gravel truck.

The crash took place at a controlled crossing about 100 kilometres east of Winnipeg on Monday.

The driver of the gravel truck and two train operators were taken to hospital with minor injuries but were treated and released.

The train is owned by the City of Winnipeg's water and waste department, and did not spill any fuel and was not carrying dangerous material.

Manitoba RCMP tweeted that they have charged the driver with failing to stop.

Tom Nixon, fire chief in the Rural Municipality of Reynolds, said the driver of the truck was a member of his volunteer fire department.

Nixon said he has driven the same road at the same time of day and had similar trouble trying to see the crossing.

Road project flawed: Report

Auditor found bad accounting and lack of oversight

The effort to build an extensive road network to connect remote First Nations communities in eastern Manitoba has been hurt by a lack of oversight and flawed accounting practices, the province's auditor general said Tuesday.

In a 32-page report, Norm Ricard said there was little or no effort made to ensure indigenous communities received the jobs, training, procurement and other benefits they have been promised under the East Side road project - a $3-billion, 30-year plan to replace winter roads with all-season gravel routes between 13 com-

"The lack of performance measures and targets makes it difficult to objectively assess the progress made to date in achieving the anticipated benefits," Ricard wrote.

The project was announced in 2008 by the former NDP government and handed to a newly created government agency the East Side Road Authority. The authority struck agreements with each community that outlined training, employment and other benefits. Ricard found that the authority:

 Did not track whether people who received training under the agreements ended up working on the project.

 Failed to keep track of whether local companies received their promised share of the spending.

He also discovered that in a sample of 41 equipment assessments, 21 pieces of machinery had a variety of problems ranging from minor fluid leaks to being inoperable.

Manitoba Hydro - your energy expert

Time to check your home's heating system...

Winter heating costs can consume up to 60 per cent of a household's energy budget. Now is the time to check your heating system to ensure your heating dollars aren't being wasted.

On average, a pre-1990 standard efficiency natural gas furnace uses up to 35 per cent more energy than a new high efficiency natural gas furnace. Consider replacing your old heating system before it fails so you can avoid the costs and hassle of an emergency replacement. A new furnace will reduce your heating costs by up to one-third!

Here are some tips.

Don't heat a drafty home. All homes lose warm air to the outside and let cold air in. Beyond what you need for fresh air, you're wasting heat. Sealing gaps and cracks will help reduce heat loss.

Check your furnace filter monthly to ensure it is not too dirty or clogged and replace it every three months. With a clean furnace filter, your heating system will use less energy and last longer.

Make sure all heating vents are open and unblocked by furniture and other objects. This ensures that the circulating air is evenly distributed throughout your home.

Set your thermostat back a few degrees when you are away or overnight, and then turn the temperature back up when you come home or in the morning. If you want to automate this temperature control, purchase a programmable or smart thermostat.

Have a qualified technician do an annual maintenance and inspection of your heating system in fall and check your carbon monoxide detector at the same time.

For additional advice on saving energy...

Trudeau rejects 'anxiety' politics

GENERAL ASSEMBLY

World leaders take aim at Trumpism, call for unity

Justin Trudeau's first speech to the United Nations General Assembly included some less-thansubtle references to the politics practised by people like Donald Trump, in a year where populist nationalism has made gains in different countries.

The prime minister never mentioned any names, yet warned three times in his speech about politicians who exploit anxiety for personal gain. Politicians have a choice to make. Trudeau said: Stoke public angst because it works for them politically, or try alleviating it with policies that improve people's lives.

He cast his government's spending-heavy program as the latter — with an infrastructure plan that he's convinced will create middle-class jobs.

"What is the alternative?" Trudeau asked. "To exploit anxiety? To turn it into fear and blame? To reject others because they look, or speak, or pray differently than we do?"

His message was similar to that of Barack Obama. Before Trudeau delivered his first UN address, the U.S. president gave his last. Obama defended globalization; derided walls between nations; and encouraged policies that allow working people to experience the benefits of the global economy.

Trudeau and Obama didn't discuss their speeches beforehand. One official said any similarities simply stemmed from coincidence and a shared world view.

That level of agreement was illustrated later in the day during a discussion on refugees, where Obama saluted Trudeau: "I want to personally thank Chancellor Merkel and Prime Minister Trudeau and the people of both those countries ... it's the right thing to do." THE CANADIAN PRESS

Trudeau has been in New York this week to address the UN, where much of the buzz has been about Canada's intake of Syrian refugees. Here's how the country got to this point:

1946-1962: Canada admitted nearly a quarter of a million refugees who were privately sponsored. 1976: Canada tabled a new Immigration Act in 1976 which, for the first time, recognized refugees as a special class of immigrants. Leaders have 'blood on their hands'

Taking the world stage for the last time as secretary general, Ban Ki-moon unleashed years of anger at leaders who keep "feeding the war machine" in Syria, violate human rights and prevent aid deliveries to starving people. The UN chief told presidents, prime ministers, monarchs and ministers at the opening of General Assembly's meeting that "powerful patrons" on both sides in the Syrian conflict "have blood on their hands." THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

United Nations Secretary-General Ban Kimoon railed Tuesday against leaders who keep "feeding the war machine" in Syria as he bowed out of the world stage, while U.S. President Barack Obama said there was no military solution to the five-year conflict and described a globe in the throes of a contest between authoritarianism and democracy.

Both Ban and Obama were making their final speeches at the annual gathering of world leaders at the United Nations. They did so against a backdrop of mounting bloodshed and a failing ceasefire in Syria, escalating attacks around the world by Islamic extremists and millions fleeing fighting and poverty.

The UN chief, whose 10-year period at the helm of the unwieldy world body ends Dec. 31, vented his pent-up frustration with uncharacteristic candour, telling the opening of the General Assembly's annual ministerial meeting that "powerful patrons" on both sides in the Syrian conflict - which he did not identify -"have blood on their hands."

"Present in this hall today are representatives of governments that have ignored, facilitated, funded, participated in or even planned and carried out atrocities inflicted by all sides of the Syria conflict against Syrian civilians," he said.

But Ban blamed the Syrian government for the most deaths. He said it was continuing to drop barrel bombs on neighbourhoods and torture thousands of detainees. Syria's Foreign Ministry condemned Ban's address and contended that the UN had failed to resolve any conflicts on his watch.

Ban spoke as the U.S., Russia and more than a dozen other countries attempted to resurrect a week-old truce, and Washington and Moscow argued over who was responsible for an attack Monday on an aid convoy that killed some 20 civilians that the UN chief denounced as a "sickening, savage and apparently deliberate attack."

The Syrian conflict has killed as many as half-million people, contributed to Europe's worst refugee crisis since World War II and allowed the rise of Daesh.

However, Ban also noted positive developments during his decade as UN chief. He cited the rise of "people power" with mo-bile phones that now blanket the world, reductions in poverty, political transitions in Myanmar and Sri Lanka and the ceasefire in Colombia.

Countries, companies pledge aid

World leaders gathered at the UN pledged Tuesday to take in 360,000 refugees next year, U.S. President Barack Obama said, roughly doubling the previous year's allowance.

The United States said 52 countries taking part in a U.S.led summit were stepping up to accelerate resettlement and boost financial support for refugees. The White House did not release a full list of participating countries or a breakdown of their pledges, making Obama's boast of major headway impossible to confirm.

Private companies were stepping up, too. The White House said more than fourdozen U.S. businesses had pledged $650 million, including Facebook, Twitter, Master-Card and Johnson & Johnson.

The commitments announced Tuesday fell far short of what aid groups say is needed. Some 65 million people around the world have fled their homes. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

'Bombs will be heard' in the streets: Suspect

NEW YORK CITY

Terrorism charges filed against Ahmad Khan Rahami

Ahmad Khan Kahami vowed to martyr himself rather than be caught after setting off explosives in New York and New Jersey, and he'd hoped in a handwritten journal championing jihad that "the sounds of bombs will be heard in the streets," authorities said Tuesday as they filed federal terrorism charges against him.

Criminal complaints in Manhattan and New Jersey federal courts provided chilling descriptions of the motivations that authorities said drove the Afghan-born U.S. citizen to set off explosives in New York and New Jersey, including a bomb that injured more than two dozen people when it blew up on a busy Manhattan street.

Meanwhile, more details emerged Tuesday about Rahami's past, including the dis-closure that the FBI had looked into him in 2014 but came up with nothing.

According to the court complaints, Rahami's journal included a passage that said: "You (USA Government) continue your (unintelligible) slaught(er)" against the mujahideen, or holy warriors, in Afghanistan and elsewhere.

"Death to your oppression." the journal ended.

One portion expressed concern at the prospect of being caught before being able to carry out a suicide aftack and the desire to be a martyr, the complaints said. Still another section included a reference to "pipe bombs" and a "pressure cooker bomb" and declared: "In the streets they plan to run a mile," an apparent reference to one of the blast sites. a charity run in a New Jersey shore town.

EMMA TEITEL ON SOCIAL BRANDING

Personal brands are no longer solely the business of celebrities or real estate agents. They are the business of us all—especially who are looking for a job.

A few days ago I was in the process of posting a dorky family photo to my wife Ella's Instagram account when she stopped me dead in my cyber-tracks.

"Don't post that," she said.
"It's off brand,"
"Off brand," I asked?

"What brand?"

"My personal brand," she said.

We have been together almost a decade but for some reason I had no idea that all this time, she was curating a "personal brand" on social media.

"I call it art-cute," she told me. (Not to be confused with art-brut, French for "Outsider Art").

What does this mean? In her own words: "Artsy photographs with a lot of emoticons in the captions."

I asked Ella if I had a personal brand and she said that beyond my column-writing persona (young-ish, gay Canadian), my social media presence needed serious work. "It's just random photos of friends and strangers' dogs," she said. "There's no discernible theme."

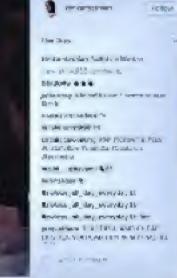

I don't care, I told her.
But it turns out, I should.
Unfortunately, Ella is onto something. Personal brands are no longer solely the business of celebrities or real estate agents; they are the business of us all. And I'm not just referring to people in the media or public relations professions, but to anyone at any age and in any industry—

What's troubling Is the likelihood that these services will slowly erode the fun of social media especially if he or she is looking for a job.

It's no mystery that employers often investigate the social media presence of job candidates, but this practice has become so routine in recent years that for some them know that too.

But the company's role goes beyond flagging offensive or illegal content. It also tracks how influential a job candidate is: how many followers they have and how many people their posts bosses, it demands the special care of a professional service.

Enter The Social Index, an Australian startup that helps employers determine a job candidate's social media persona and influence. The company, which launched this year and plans to expand to the U.K. soon, scours the public Facebook, Twitter and LinkedIn profiles of a job candidate and produces a report — or in the company's own words, a "core analysis" — summarizing the person's online presence.

According to managing director Fiona McLean, the company's "core analyses" show employers how job candidates "represent" themselves online, and ensure "that appropriate online behaviours are evident." Of course, if those "appropriate behaviours" aren't evident, it lets reach.

McLean says The Social Index obtains job candidates' consent when it conducts its investigations. But the service does pose a lot of thorny ethical questions. Such as: if a job seeker makes political statements on Facebook or Twitter that don't align with their potential employer's views, can The Social Index relay this information to the employer?

McLean says no — that The Social Index only relays "relevant" professional information to employers and as a result, reduces bias. But "relevant information" might mean many different things to many different people.

For example: "Bob Smith Tweeted 3,600 times yester-day," might be music to some bosses' ears but it's also likely to be misery to others'.

In the end, what's troubling about The Social Index, and similar social media investigative startups that are likely to launch in years to come, isn't that they are invading our privacy.

On the contrary, the content that the Social Index accesses is 100 per cent public.

What's troubling, rather, is the likelihood that these services will slowly erode the fun of social media itself. Having a distinct personality or a weird, albeit totally inoffensive presence on Instagram (like for example, Ella's "art-cute") is as of now, not a bad thing.

You can be a lawyer who tweets about baseball, an IT specialist who hates Justin Trudeau, or a columnist who loves Kernel's Popcorn. Sure, your boss may check in every once in a while to see what you're up to but unless you're a teacher or a political operative, as long as you're not espousing hate or breaking the law, you're probably okay.

But in the future of the The Social Index, a future where employers hire agencies to write detailed reports about job candidates' online activity, you'd be foolish not to mould your personal brand into something bland, mainstream and easily palatable. And you'd be hesitant, I suspect, to post anything interesting or offbeat at all.

The irony in this is that while companies like the Social Index exist to encourage transparency and reveal truths about the job candidates they are investigating, they are likely to achieve exactly the opposite: that is, a working world in which employers know less about the people they are hiring than ever before.

Grits taking losses where they expected wins

Everyone suspected the return of Parliament would provide a bumpy ride for a Liberal government still enjoying sustained popularity nearly a year after the election.

The surprise is that the turbulence has set in so quickly.

Let's look at two strengths the Trudeau Liberals thought they had, and one weakness they knew would plague them. All have conspired to make the first half of their week lousy.

First, the weakness. "Entitlement is our kryptonite," a senior Liberal told me eight months before last year's federal election. Liberals know Canadians grow weary of them when they act as though they have always been in power, will always be in power, and are frankly impatient with the short interludes when Canadians elect someone else.

So it must have stung when Global News reported on Tuesday that a single unidentified staffer in the Prime Minister's Office billed taxpayers $126,669.56 in moving costs to relocate to Ottawa. A second charged $80.382.55.

That's a lot of kayptonite.

It's one thing when Liberals get criticized for spending money. To some extent, every government faces the same steady stream of flak from the opposition benches, and there is no way the Liberals can positively gain voter support through ostentatious displays of frugality. It's quite another matter when the Liberals take criticism, some of it richly earned, on issues they thought would be winners for them. The week's most spectacular example is climate change.

To some extent, what's happened is that Catherine McKenna, the rookie environment minister, has been slow to learn the cost of over-promising. When she got her job last autumn, she was eager to proclaim that the carbon-reduction targets set by the Conservatives were a minimum.

She has since realized that this government will be lucky to come anywhere close to meeting Harper's targets. The belated backtracking began over the weekend. The hard work lies ahead. The damage on the Liberals' environmental left could be long-lasting. Green Party leader Elizabeth May called McKenna's backtracking "nothing short of a disaster for the climate."

The second area where considerable effort from Trudeau seems to be paying exceedingly modest dividends is on his much-vaunted reconciliation with indigenous groups. Ottawa has started issuing construction permits for BC Hydro's Site C dam, over the objection of First Nations that have taken the government to court over the project. Charlie Angus, an NDP MP who's been quick to praise the Liberals on indigenous issues when he thought they deserved it, called the move a failed test for the Trudeau government.

Trudeau has been used to getting some of his most glowing coverage from news sources outside Canada. But in the U.K.'s Guardian newspaper, an article appeared that called his "lofty rhetoric" on First Nations a "simulation of justice."

The best remedy for all these ills is progress on these and other files. Promising was easy, consulting not much harder. Now comes deciding.

Brangelina started their breakup in By The Sea

Peter Howell

Torstar News Service

News of the impending divorce of Brad Pitt and Angelina Jolie may come as a shock for the suddenness of the announcement.

But it's hardly a surprise. Hollywood's most famous celebrity couple, together since 2004 but only married since August 2014, dropped giant hints about their troubled union in By the Sea, the movie released in 2015 that they made on their honeymoon.

Written and directed by Jolie, who also stars in it opposite Pitt, it's a film I called "a marital drama that may also double as cinematic confession" in my review last November.

Jolie insisted the film wasn't autobiographical, but that seemed disingenuous at the time, now doubly so in light of Tuesday's revelation of the "Brangelina" split.

To me it was as plain as the screen in front of your face that Pitt and Jolie were attempting to use their art to work out their personal issues.

Pitt plays Roland, a writer whose pen and sense of romance have both cooled. Jolie is Vanessa, who seems almost catatonic in her disaffection towards life and love. They barely speak to each other, and she won't even help him light his cigarette in the car scene that opens the movie. (Such a change from the bantering Mr. & Mrs. Smith, the 2005 comedy thriller where Pitt and Jolie also play a fractious married couple.)

Roland and Vanessa have been together 14 years, a little longer than Pitt and Jolie were. They've travelled to a seaside hotel in France (the film was actually shot on the Maltese island of Gozo) to see if they can relight the flames of amour and artistic inspiration.

Discovering a peephole in their wall, they get distracted spying on the athletic sexcapades of a young married couple, played by Mélanie Laurent and Melvil Poupaud, in the room next door. Roland and Vanessa watch with a mixture of guilt, regret and jealousy.

Most critics weren't kind to By the Sea, dismissing it as a vanity project. It registered just 34 per cent on the Rotten Tomatoes meter.

I saw value in the film — I rated it "good" at 2.5 stars out of 4 — and appreciated how Jolie and Pitt were sincerely trying to work things out in a place where they obviously feel so much at home: in front

Beyond the strange dual voyeurism — Brad and Angie peeping at someone while inviting us to peep at them — I argued the film's deeper intent is illustrating the ebb and flow of marriage and the need to not just accept that reality, but to embrace it.

"Why not just love her?" a bartender named Michel (Niels Arestrup) advises Roland. The recently widowed Michel knows that the heart can rise above

Sadly, this part of the film turned out to be fiction.

Finger-lickin' quest to get to the bottom of a greasy mystery

Area 51, The Lost City of Atlantis, Jack the Ripper, Stone-

All of these pale in comparison to the greatest mystery known to mankind: how to make KFC's chicken.

Sure, KFC isn't really the gold standard of fried chicken (an informal poll in the newsroom showed that Popeyes, Church's and Chick-N-Joy are the chain favourites) but the allure of the secret 11 herbs and spices that make up Colonel Sander's original recipe still remains since he started cooking for weary travellers at a Kentucky service station in 1930.

A recent alleged leak of the fried chicken recipe to the Chicago Tribune is the latest recipe claiming to be the real thing (or at least closest to the real thing).

American cookbook author Todd Wilbur made a career replicating fast food recipes and published his first book, Top Secret Recipes, in 1993, which contains his version of KFC's original recipe fried chicken. In 2009, another fast food sleuth Ron Douglas published America's Most Wanted Recipes with another version of the chicken.

In a book, Colonel Sanders and the American Dream, late food writer Josh Ozersky wrote that Sanders commissioned Indiana-based spice company Marion-Kay to recreate his spice blend. The spice blend is still sold today under the name, though its exact ingredients aren't It's time to get to the bottom of this. I tested the recipe published in The Chicago Tribune, along with Wilbur and Douglas' recipe, with some adaptations.

Shortly after posting a picture of my recipe testing on Instagram, a social media rep for KFC Canada left a comment regarding the recent alleged recipe leak.

"Many people have made these claims over the years and no one has been accurate — this one isn't either," they wrote.

"Our chicken is hand

The 11 herbs and spices KFC uses in its fried chicken remain something of a deep-fried secret, Torstar News Service/Supplied breaded and freshly prepared in restaurants all day every day, so they had that part right!"

The goal here isn't to make the best fried chicken, but to make KFC's chicken.

However, there is one step missing from most of these copycat recipes: pressure frying.

The Colonel popularized using a modified pressure cooker to prepare chicken faster while keeping the skin crispy and the meat moist. KFC still does it today.

That being said, it's not recommended to use an athome pressure cooker to deep fry as the machines aren't designed to hold a lot of oil under pressure.

With that in mind, I deepfried the chicken, but not in a pressure cooker.

After two days of experimenting and dozens of consumed drumsticks, an unscientific test by fried chicken fans picked the Todd Wilbur version as the closest to KFC.

At right, in dedication to the pursuit of the secret, is the test and tasting notes from the other recipes.

♠ KFC original recipe, as published in The Chicago Tribune

"Muted" is how our restaurant critic Amy Pataki described the taste. Other coworkers called it "bland" and "meh." The meat was juicy and the skin was crisp, but it was missing that salty, peppery kick as well as the golden wrinkly skin for which KFC is known. We also did a double-bread version in an attempt to up the saltiness, but it just made a comically large drumstick straight out of The Flintstones. Despite the amount of spice — three tablespoons of white pepper and a quarter cup (I) of paprika — it still tasted kind of blah, probably because the breading has two cups of flour, which may have drowned out the seasoning.

Ron Douglas' KFC Original Recipe Fried Chicken

Originally published in 2009's America's Most Wanted Recipes, Douglas' recipe for his version of KFC calls for a pressure fryer, which few people have at home so I deep fried it instead. The result doesn't really taste like KFC, and is somewhere between the recipe published in the Chicago Tribune and Wilbur's version. It's good, but missing the spicy, salty kick. Visually, it also came out darker than KFC's chicken.

OIL

Fried chicken tips:

Essential gear: An oil/candy thermometer is an absolute must. They're relatively inexpensive and can be picked up at any kitchen store for about $15. They are also handy for melting sugar and making holiday confections.

What to do with the oil: Frying oil can be reused multiple times. Let it cool down completely and strain out any leftover fried bits. Store in an airtight container away from heat or light. Never pour oil down the sink as it'll clog your pipes. Small amounts can be tossed in the Green Bins as they'll be absorbed by organic matter. Oil can also be poured into a sealed container and tossed into the trash.

Todd Wilbur's KFC Original Recipe, Baking Powder Variation

I made this recipe three times with various adaptations. The recipe tastes the closest to the original KFC recipe even though it was deep-fried not pressure-fried. Salty, juicy, a hint of that herbal spice, the flavours are pretty close. The biggest difference is the texture: KFC's skin is softer while this version is much crispier and more delicate. Most taste testers said this is the closest to KFC. Some liked it better. Wilbur's recipe calls for tellicherry pepper, a finer type of black pepper known for its fruity notes, from the Malabar region of India. I doubt the Colonel was using this. If you want that iconic salty, spicy umamibomb go to the Colonel. If you want a crispier version with a fresher herbal taste, make this at home.

A chili to ease the transition to fall

A simple meal packed with lean protein and veggies

We're in that weird transition period between summer and fall. Food magazines and clothing stores are telling you to snuggle up with a bowl of stew while wearing a sweater, but in the real world, temperatures can still be sweltering. Enter chili: synonymous with backyard barbecues and cookoffs, but hearty enough to keep you warm when temperatures inevitably dip.

This chili is packed with veggies, beans and lean turkey, yielding a protein and fibrepacked bowl that will fill you up and give you the energy to get in those last swims and volleyball matches for the summer. The chili's flavours intensify overnight, so while you can eat this right after cooking, it's so much better the next day. To make a vegetarian version, take out the ground turkey and swap in more beans (try chickpeas or pinto beans), and add more hearty veggies such as chopped celery, carrot and cauliflower.

Winemaking for millennials

Peter Rockwell For Metro Canada,

While old-school wine snobs may cringe at the thought of the younger generation commandeering their favourite beverage, a recent report from the U.S.-based Wine Market Council noted that 42 per cent of all wine consumed south of the border last year was drunk by millennials.

Liquor boards across Canada acknowledge that sales are booming thanks to wine engaged, millennial-aged customers who, more than any other purchasing collective, are interested in the stories behind what they buy.

They're package hounds to boot, which is why the wine industry is tripping over itself to create wines that will call from the shelf to this coveted consumer group.

New low glycemic index potato appeals to diabetics, low-carb eaters

People who avoid potatoes to reduce their carb intake can now try a new Ontario-grown variety that's touted to have a lower glycemic response. meaning it doesn't cause the rapid spike in blood sugar that normally comes from eating carbohydrate-rich foods.

While controlling blood sugar is important for those with diabetes or at risk of developing the disease, there's a health benefit for everyone. says Joanne Lewis, director of nutrition and diabetes education with the Canadian Diabetes Association in Toronto.

The new Carisma potato, which is being grown in Waterdown, Ont., will be available in limited quantities in select stores in Ontario this fall, says EarthFresh Farms, the grower and distributor of the spud.

Depending on seed yields. the Carisma will likely be grown next year in Alberta, Manitoba, Quebec and Prince Edward Island, EarthFresh Farms says.

"The nice thing about having a potato that's low glycemic index is that people lately have become more careful about the type of carbohydrate that they consume and potatoes sort of have been given a bad rap because it's considered like a white starch," says Lewis.

"But having a low glycemic index potato is kind of a winwin because you can still basically enjoy your potatoes."

A food is designated low glycemic if it is rated 55 or less on a scale of 100 when compared to a standard — usually straight glucose or white bread. Testers look at the impact on blood sugars within a two-hour range from consumption in comparison to the standard.

"What that's demonstrating is that the blood sugars don't rise as much after consumption as if you were to have another food with a higher glycemic index and so there's a lot of health benefits to low glycemic index," says Lewis.

"There's a lot of evidence around cardiovascular benefits, definitely for people with diabetes, satiety and sustained

Foods with a low-glycemic response include pulses, such as lentils and dried beans and peas, as well as sweet potatoes, and steel-cut oats, says Lewis, adding the low-glycemic index is part of the CDA's nutritional standards. THE CANADIAN PRESS

More than fans and pasties

Burlesque is provocative, empowering, and more than a little titillating, and next month some of the art form's best will thrill Winnipeggers at the city's first ever international burlesque festival.

The inaugural Winnipeg International Burlesque Festival runs Oct. 20-22 at the Park Theatre and organizer Carmen Murray — better known to fans of burlesque as Dixie Cups — says audiences can expect to see a little bit of everything at the festival.

"There'll be fans and pasties — that's the classic, sexy side of burlesque — but there's so much more," she says. "There's a comic side to it, a vaudeville side to it, there's acrobatics, it'll be a very diverse showcase and you really don't know what's going to happen next."

The festival is restricted to those 18 years of age and older, but Murray says performers don't go too far.

"There's partial nudity — it's down to pasties and underwear — but whether it's about classic beauty, or whether it's meant to make you laugh, it's done in such an artful way," she says. "You're really going to see more on your next trip to the beach than you'll see on the stage."

Headliners at the festival include Winnipeg favourite Miss Angela La Muse, New York "brolesque" sensation Matt Knife, and Arabella Allure who is originally from Australia but now lives in Edmonton. The festival will also feature burlesque workshops led by the headliners, and the Winnipeg premier of the Canadian-made documentary League of Exotique Dancers, which explores the world of vintage burlesque.

Volunteer. Perform. Buy tickets.

The festival is looking for valunteers of all kinds including front of house, promoters, performers, stage kittens — who will get the chance to give burlesque a shot on stage while helping performers — VIP hosts, and organizers. Anyone interested in helping in the fun can message organizers at the Winnipeg Burlesque Festival Facebook page or email winnipegburlesque@gmail.com.

Performers can apply online at winnipegburlesquefest.ca.

Early bird tickets for individual nights are $25 until Oct. 1 and all tickets are available at myparktheatre.com.

AUTUMN AUTO

Different seasons require new strategies for car care

Jason Menard

Your vehicle isn't a one-sizefits-all-season tool. Different seasons and changing temperatures call for targeted care, so there are a few things you can do to help prepare for the autumn season.

Before you take care of the vehicle, you need to adjust some things behind the wheel.

"Fall weather can be unpredictable. The temperatures can drastically change and leaves on the road can become hazardous and slippery," explained Kristine D'Arbelles, manager of public affairs for CAA. "Be aware of the road conditions and the potential weather before you leave. Make sure your wiper blades are in good working order and you have topped up your windshield wiper fluid.

"Leave yourself plenty of time and plan for the weather."

Wiper blades, though often taken for granted, need regular maintenance - and that's vitally important during the inclement weather that fall can bring.

"Check your windshield wipers. Watch out for chips and cracks that leave your windshield with streaks or missed spots — these can limit your field of vision and cause distractions while driving," D'Arbelles said. "Remember that wiper blades used regularly should be replaced every six months. Don't forget to top up your windshield wiper fluid while you're at it."

Autumn weather can be unpredictable, going from cold to hot seemingly overnight. Those fluctuations in temperature have an impact on your vehicle.

"Changes in temperature can affect your tire pressure, be sure to check them monthly and check the owner's manual or the sidewall for the right pressure," D'Arbelles explained. "Extreme cold or heat can both be hard on a vehicle's battery. Test your battery to make sure it's in good working condition and ready for the winter months.

"Check over your car's lights and make sure they are functioning like they should. If any lights are burnt out replace them."

And don't forget to ensure your heating system is taken care of - both for comfort and

"Make sure that your heating, ventilating and air conditioning system is in good working order," she said. "Not only is the system important for your own personal comfort, but they are critical once temperatures get below freezing. Frosted windshields affect visibility and can make driving dangerous."

First off, it can haul your entire family and all their stuff. Not only is there plenty of space for rear-seat passengers to stretch their legs, but access to those rear seats is also quite generous, making the climb into the back less cumbersome.

Driving the Durango really accentuates its big, soft attitude. Unlike what GM did with its full-size SUVs in trying to make them handle tighter, the Durango floats and rolls down the road, offering a pillow soft ride inside. Taking hard corners is certainly not confidence inspiring, but then again, a vehicle like this doesn't need to stay dinner plate flat through the twisties. What it needs to do is deliver top-notch comfort, and the Durango is spot on.

If inspiring driving dynamics are really your thing, you might want to look elsewhere for an SUV, especially considering how many great handling SUVs are out there these days. If big, boring and comfy is more your speed, the Durango is what you're looking for, though its style doesn't say "boring."

A fascia that says "I'm pissed off" keeps the Durango looking like a mean machine, especially when outfitted with the Blacktop package like our tester was.

While the top-trim Durango Citadel sports a proper luxury interior, our SXT base model still offers all the things that count. The seats in the Durango are nice and plush, while the dash and centre stack are a black plastic affair. While it may not win any style awards, the simplicity of the interior makes it easy to operate every function.

In Canada, a base model Durango SXT starts at $43,395, while the model we tested rings in at $46,435. Compared to the Ford Explorer, that's almost $10,000 over its base price of just over $33,000. The Pathfinder also starts right around $34,000, proving to be a lot less expensive than the big Dodge SUV.

The V6-powered Durango is reminiscent of the first generation of SUVs that were all about being big and comfy. Along with a fairly efficient V6 and a nicely set up interior, this big brute proves that it is still a relevant product in a sea of updated SUVs and crossovers.

King Henrik returns to throne for Sweden

Lundqvist stops 36 shots in shutting out Finland

The old Henrik Lundqvist was back in net for Sweden.

The 34-year-old goaltender sprinkled in some highlightreel saves while stopping 36 Finnish shots in Sweden's 2-0 win at the World Cup of Hockey.

"We were confident with him coming in today, even after Jacob (Markstrom) played such a good game like he did (on Sunday)," said Swedish captain Henrik Sedin. "Being around Henrik for a few weeks now, we knew he was going to come in and have a great game."

Anton Stralman and Loui Eriksson provided the offence for the Swedes (2-0-0), who now have a firm grip on the top spot in Group B. Finland, who dropped to 0-2-0 with the loss, is in tough to advance to the semifinals.

Lundqvist, who missed Sweden's first game of the tournament on Sunday due to an illness, struggled in pretournament competition posting a 4.49 goals-against average and a .778 save percentage in two appearances. The Rangers goaltender was pulled from last Wednesday's game against Team Europe after allowing five goals on 22 shots in a 6-2 loss. "I felt pretty rusty out there the first period, not as aware as I wanted to be, but I got some really good help with some lose pucks and stuff like that," Lundqvist said. "Second and third,

I felt more comfortable, but it was fun. I really enjoyed being out there playing. Big game, important game, not being able to play the first, you never know where it's going when you're not healthy."

Tuukka Rask, starting in the Finnish goal over Pekka Rinne, stopped 27 shots in the loss.

"We played such a great game, started off well, created so many good scoring chances, but we didn't score," said Finnish coach Lauri Marjamaki. "Of course the goalie Lundqvist was impressive. But so proud of my players and our team effort. It was great today. But it is not enough."

Finland's Mikael Granlund had two excellent chances to tie the game just past the midway mark of the third, but Lundqvist got his right pad on the first shot and Granlund put his rebound off the post. THE CANADIAN PRESS

Injured Garoppolo back at Pats practice

Bill Belichick isn't ready to rule out injured quarterback Jimmy Garoppolo for Thursday night's game against the Texans.

The Patriots coach also isn't interested in sharing any contingency plans he might have.

Garoppolo was a limited participant in practice Tuesday as he continues to recover from the right shoulder injury he sustained late in the first half of New England's win over the Dolphins last week. The third-year quarterback sat out Monday's practice.

Texans coach Bill O'Brien

I think we have to be ready for their roster. We have to understand the skill sets on their roster.

The Patriots have yet to add another quarterback to the roster, increasing the possibility that rookie Jacoby Brissett could make his first career start against Houston (2-0) if Garoppolo can't go. In that situation, receiver Julian Edelman would be the emergency option.

It didn't stop an onslaught of Garoppolo-related health questions on Tuesday. It drove Belichick to the point of agitation as he was pressed about Garoppolo's status.

> "He has been looked at. He has been treated, like every other player," Belichick said.

As inquiries persisted, he made it clear that whatever is going on with Garoppolo, what was best for his health would take precedence. "I'm a football coach. I'm not a doctor," Belichick said.

But he does have a reputation of being a master of misdirection. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
